The ruts form an arc 0.4 miles high with the legs resting 1.7 miles apart on the north side of US 50.

The trail, consisting of several separate tracks, is about 400 feet in width.

Intrusions include the highway, a railroad and an irrigation ditch built in the 1890's which winds back and forth across the ruts.

In addition, the Arkansas River has shifted as much as a half a mile to the south from its historic channel.

Despite these alterations in the historic scene, the well-defined ruts retain a great deal of their historic integrity.

The Boothill Association (which operates a reconstructed Dodge City) protects and interprets its part of the area from a pull-off provided by the highway department. The other owner also appreciates the historic significance of his property. Cattle grazing is the only commercial use made of the landmark.

The abandoned irrigation ditch, although not related to the ruts, was a notable engineering achievement for its time and has historic significance of its own.
On January 29, 1822, four trail-worn men rode into Franklin, Missouri. Forty-eight days before, they had left San Miguel—50 miles southeast of Santa Fe. In their packs were the fruits of their journey to New Mexico. As townspeople gathered to welcome Captain William Becknell and his companions, the packs were opened. Not the furs of an Indian Trader spilled out, but heavy rawhide sacks. One of the traders held high a sack and slashed its thongs. Silver pesos tumbled to the ground and rolled into the gutter, and the eyes of onlookers widened.

Before those coins were gathered up, news of the first successful Missouri-to-Santa Fe trading expedition was already on its way to the adventurous, enterprising men who would soon throng the trail to the City of Holy Faith. Romance and profit would keynote the Santa Fe Trail throughout its existence. No ordinary man, unused to dreams, would have slashed those thongs. The one who did knew well the drama of the moment. In that act is summed up much that lent and still lends to the Santa Fe Trail and its namesake city an air of El Dorado. It was partly this that lured the early traders to gamble their lives and their investments against distance, terrain, weather, hostile Indians, and the caprice of Mexican customs officials.

But the trail was more than an escape valve for high-spirited men, or the route by which the mule came to Missouri. More even than a commercial and cultural link between the borderlands of the United States and Mexico. Manifest Destiny would travel this trail. For at its end was an empire of mesa and mountain, of canyon and river, of desert and vast distance. An empire ripe for picking. Thus did the trail become a military highway clogged with the freight and the banners of war.

After the Army of the West had done its bloodless duty, and the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo had sealed the conquest, this empire had to be administered and protected and provisioned. The men and the material for this gigantic task came over the Santa Fe Trail. For two decades after the Mexican War the Santa Fe Trail held undisputed position as trunkline to the Southwest. It was the road and the tie by which civilization and sovereignty filtered into this wild expanse, tamed it, and fused it to the Nation. All that followed the Mexican War on this trail—gold rush, Civil War, Indian war, stagecoach, emigrant train, and the constant plod of oxen hauling tandem freighters—was part of this task of consolidating the conquest of 1846-48.

The railroad came, pushing the eastern terminus of the trail ever westward, until finally by 1880 there was no more trail. Then faded into legend the bearded trader and all that fabulous crew that had followed him across the desert and mountain and plain to Spanish Santa Fe. Something grand was lost thereby, days of adventure and great accomplishment gone forever.
But the product of those days is with us yet, a booming subcontinent—the modern Southwest. And this is the true significance of the Santa Fe Trail, the first great trail of the West. (NSHSE)

The section of the trail designated as a landmark climbed high ground to avoid the Arkansas River which during the historic period ran close to the bluff.
The ruts at this point offer an excellent illustration of how the freighters worked with the terrain to make the easiest passage for their wagons.

This part of the trail is on the old Mexican-American border which followed the Arkansas River prior to the Mexican War. At this place the ruts are only a few miles from the Cimarron Crossing of the river where the trail split into its Mountain and Cimarron branches, and where the latter crossed into Mexican territory.

The period of historic significance for the landmark segment of the trail begins with William Becknell's pioneering expedition of 1821 and ends in 1873 when the railroad continued west from Dodge City.
