The Marais des Cygnes Massacre, which took place on May 19, 1858, is today commemorated by a memorial park administered by the Kansas State Historical Society and owned by the State of Kansas. Situated about 4 miles northeast of Trading Post, the park is characteristic of the area surrounding it. Within the park, the massacre site is located in a small ravine 700 feet northwest of the visitor center and is marked with a plaque briefly describing the episode.

The abolitionist John Brown shortly after the massacre built a "fort" about 220 yards south of the ravine. The fort, built of logs and banked with dirt and rocks, is no longer in existence. Adjoining this site is a three-level stone house built by Charles C. Hadsall, probably in the 1870s, which has been restored and is now operated as a State-owned museum by the Kansas State Historical Society. The park is open to the public.

The area north and northeast of the park is affected by strip mining operations of the Kansas City Power and Light Company (Missouri). To provide adequate screening from this potential intrusion, as well as others unforeseen, it is essential that the park boundary be regarded as the minimum extent of the historic site.

The site is public property.
The Civil War fought in Kansas in the 1850s between slave and free-state factions branded that inflamed Commonwealth as "bleeding Kansas." After 2 years of terrorism, on May 19, 1858, a band of proslavery sympathizers crossed into Kansas from Missouri, captured 11 men in the vicinity of Trading Post, and shot them down in a nearby ravine known today as the site of the Marais des Cygnes Massacre. That vicious incident illustrated the extent of brutality to which the confrontation over slavery could reach. The murderous episode touched off a national outcry best remembered in John Greenleaf Whittier's poem, "Le Marais du Cygne." The outrage lent its force to the defeat of the proslavery Lecompton Constitution for Kansas and attracted John Brown and his party to construct a fortification near the massacre site. The massacre thus became another prominent link in that chain of notorious events leading inexorably to civil war.

History

The stage for "Bleeding Kansas" was set by the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Act in 1854, which established the concept of popular sovereignty—a doctrine which would have the people decide by vote whether Kansas should be slave or free. A bitter contest then ensued between North and South to gain the majority in Kansas. In the North, societies, such as the New England Emigrant Aid Company, were organized to send free-state sympathizers to the Kansas Territory. Proslavery Southern immigrants were not as well organized but they had the advantage of being closer, many simply crossing from western Missouri into eastern Kansas. Throughout 1855 and 1856 the struggle between free-state and proslavery partisans dominated the Kansas scene, and there seemed little doubt that slavery would prevail. Individual acts of terrorism occurred with increasing frequency in 1856, and numerous instances of lawlessness were reported. Men were attacked, beaten, and sometimes killed for their views on slavery. In Linn and Bourbon Counties, on the eastern Kansas border, raids were constantly being carried on by the opposing factions. In effect, a civil war was being waged in eastern Kansas. Acting Governor Woodson issued a proclamation declaring that the Territory was in a state of open insurrection and rebellion. In September 1856 the arrival of the new Governor,

John W. Geary, brought relative calm to the territory. Using Federal troops from Fort Leavenworth to disband both free-state and proslavery forces, he was able to restore a semblance of order to much of Kansas. However, in the eastern border counties the incidents continued through 1857 and 1858, culminating in the Marais des Cygnes Massacre, which was the last significant display of mob violence in Kansas.

On May 19, 1858, a band of proslavery sympathizers entered Kansas from Missouri under the leadership of Charles Hamelton, a former resident of the Trading Post area who had been forced to leave by the free-state group. His band of 30 captured several unarmed free-state men at Trading Post, released all but one, and then took a road leading back to Missouri. Ten additional captives were taken either on the road, in their farm homes, or in their fields. The 11 men were marched to a ravine 4 miles northeast of Trading Post, lined up, and shot. Five were killed, five were wounded, and one was untouched by the volley from the firing squad. Leaving the victims for dead, Hamelton and his gang returned to Missouri; only one of the raiders was ever caught and officially punished for his part in the crime.

Hamelton's reasons for selecting the 11 victims are not clear. Apparently none of them had been an active participant in the factional fighting. Most of them were former neighbors of Hamelton and had no suspicion that he might harm them. The commonly held view is that Hamelton returned to Kansas for revenge and chance determined his victims.

Some reminiscences of long-time Linn County residents claim that the band had a list of free-state people to be captured, but unable to locate more than two or three, just picked up people from the neighborhood.

The Marais des Cygnes massacre was the parting shot of major proslavery action in Kansas. It came at a time when free-state influence had taken hold of the majority of the state forcing the "border ruffians" out of Topeka, Atchison, and Lawrence, and into the eastern border counties. Made upon quiet and peaceful people, the attack succeeded for it had neither the opposition of war nor armed resistance to fear.

In Kansas the massacre delayed John Brown in his fateful foray into Virginia and aroused the population to soundly reject the Lecompton Constitution in August 1858. The census of 1860 demonstrated further opposition to the attack by revealing more than 70 percent of the population to be free-state.

The Nation was horrified and John Greenleaf Whittier made the murders the subject of a poem, "Le Marais du Cygne," which was published in the Atlantic Monthly in September 1858. In Congress the Lecompton resolution, backed by President Buchanan, was defeated by legislators led in their opposition by Stephen Douglas. Though Kansas would have to wait almost 3 years, it was admitted to the Union as a free State in January 1861.

When John Brown returned to Kansas he came to the area of the massacre in June 1858 and built a "fort" on property 220 yards south of the ravine. The "fort" was two stories high, walled up with logs, and banked outside with dirt and rocks to a height of 4 feet. Though Brown made arrangements to buy the land, he apparently never made any payments and thus a friend, Charles C. Hadsall, purchased it instead in the summer of 1858. The "fort" was never attacked and Brown and his men withdrew at the end of the summer.

In later years Hadsall built a stone house which still stands adjoining the site of Brown's "fort." The "fort" itself has long before been taken away piece by piece by souvenir hunters. The house was restored in 1961-62 and is presently operated as a museum by the Kansas State Historical Society.
