The old Logan County Courthouse at Russell Springs is a two-story rectangular structure with Renaissance influenced styling. The brick and stone building faces east and measures approximately 60 feet long, 50 feet wide and 45 feet high.

Uniformly sized stone blocks laid in regular horizontal courses form the lower portion of the exterior walls. The remainder of the walls is red face brick laid in a common bond. A wider band of stone separates the stone from the brick masonry at a height even with the top of the rectangular portion of the first floor front windows. The brick masonry is corbeled out to form a cornice with brick brackets under the roof eave.

The steeply pitched hip roof is flat at the top and is covered with wood shingles. A steep, pointed, multi-faced tower roof occurs at the main entrance. The entrance is further emphasized by a wall projection running the full height to the roof line. An elaborate metal ornamental pediment with a palladian window motif terminates the entrance feature. Projecting stone brackets flank each side of the entrance at the first floor.

Each window opening on the first floor front has paired rectangular double-hung sash windows topped by a transom glass with a curved head. The window sill is formed by the stone masonry of the walls, while the window head is emphasized by a combination brick and stone arch. The keystone of this arch is stone while the bricks form the curvature. A stone block at the spring line terminates the arch. The second story windows, which are grouped in pairs, rise from the stone sill which forms a continuous band around the building. Each second story window is capped with a transom glass and an angular arched head of brick and stone. A trio of rectangular windows occurs on the second floor above the main entrance. These windows have semicircular heads and curved brick arches. The frame doors at the main entrance are flanked by rectangular windows.

A two-story stone addition was built on to the west in the 1930's, and a large heavy stone lintel has been removed from the front entrance just above where the museum sign is now placed. Otherwise the building's exterior appears much as it did originally.
The old Logan County Courthouse in Russell Springs housed the county offices for 75 years beginning in 1888. In February, 1887, the Pioneer Town Site Company of Russell Springs agreed to erect a courthouse and donate it to the county if Russell Springs were chosen the permanent county seat in an election the following December. On April 23, 1887, the town company approved the specifications and plans presented by Alfred Meyer of Atchison and instructed him to superintend the construction of the courthouse. George D. Kerns of Russell Springs contracted to build the structure.

Cornerstone ceremonies were held July 7, 1887, and by early October the second floor was almost completed. The deed to the building and grounds was transferred from the town company to the county commissioners in mid-November. The special election on December 22 resulted in a 66-vote margin for Russell Springs as the permanent county seat. The fact that a new courthouse was being constructed there at no expense to the taxpayers was a major factor in the election. The county commissioners established temporary headquarters in a nearby schoolhouse in January, 1888, and moved into the new $20,000 courthouse a short time later.

Periodic objections were raised to the county seat remaining at Russell Springs. Russell Springs was one of the two smallest county seat towns in Kansas. Population of the little community was seldom greater than 200 and at times less than 100, and after a branch line was torn up in 1918, the town had no railroad service. However, efforts to move the county seat to Oakley were defeated in a 1937 election, and a 1945 attempt failed when a petition drive to put the question on the ballot did not obtain sufficient signatures. At another election in 1960 the vote to move the county seat appeared to have fallen short of the three-fifths majority which the legislature required to change the county seat, but then the county election board disqualified eleven voters and it appeared the Russell Springs proponents had lost. Court cases followed, but the Kansas Supreme Court ruled in 1963 that the proposition had carried by 2.4 votes and ordered the county seat moved to Oakley. In July, 1963, the county officials moved out of the old courthouse.

An organization, which later became known as the Butterfield Trail Historical Association and Historical Society of Logan County, was formed in Russell Springs in October, 1964, to preserve the old Logan County Courthouse. Its efforts were successful and the old courthouse was dedicated as the Butterfield Trail Historical Museum on September 5, 1965. The old building possesses local historical significance since it was the first permanent county courthouse of Logan county and it was used for 75 years as the center of county government.
